

Update: [REDACTED]

Dear Dr. Munroe,

As you requested, I examined the relationship between the continent and [REDACTED]. Geologically speaking the data matches your original hypothesis, and based on that fact I believe that the [REDACTED] was a success – to a certain extent.

Three abnormalities in the source-code manifested at precisely the moment the [REDACTED] activated and, judging by the data I analyzed, their concurrent appearance correlates with the beginning of what became a steady decrease in the population of the continent.

Unfortunately, details concerning both said decline and the abnormalities are sparse and much of the data is corrupted, so I will require more time and higher-level access to advance my research further. Perhaps we could task Davidson to this assignment as well, as it seems right up her alley, and [REDACTED] and I do not always get along.

In the meantime, I shall endeavor to wrap my mind around the [REDACTED] language. It's actually rather fascinating, and I am making some important breakthroughs in replicating its phonetics.

Warm regards,

J.T. Orange

PS — Apologies about dinner the other night; you know what that lavender wine does to me. I hope the Ambassador wasn't too scandalized.
